

License and Terms of Use of NQX

License AGPL-3.0

The NQX system is currently distributed under the GNU Affero General Public License, Version 3.0 (AGPL-3.0), with an additional condition from NQX regarding the right to change the license.

The GNU Affero General Public License, Version 3.0, is a free license that grants users the right to use, study, modify, and distribute the software. The license requires that all modified versions or derivative works must also be distributed under the terms of AGPL-3.0, including the source code and the ability to freely obtain it. Unlike the GPL, the AGPL extends these requirements to the use of the program over a network: if the software runs on a server and provides remote access to users, they must have the ability to obtain the source code. The purpose of the license is to protect users' freedom and prevent restrictions on access to the code.

Additional Conditions of NQX

NQX reserves the right to change the license of the project in the future. Any changes in licensing must not contradict the core principles of the system, including decentralization, privacy protection, and minimization of data collection.

Privacy Policy of NQX

NQX does not collect or store any personal user data. The system does not use cookies, identifiers, or logs that could be used to track activities. All data transmission is encrypted, with no possibility of interception or analysis by third parties.

Note: This section contains a brief description of the provisions of the GNU Affero General Public License, Version 3.0, in an unofficial English translation. This description is for informational purposes only.

Only the original English version of the license is legally binding. To view the full official version of the license, refer to the original published by the Free Software Foundation at:

<https://www.gnu.org/licenses/agpl-3.0.txt>